

Ruth Hurtado

An Pham, Ph.D.

Japanese 310

September 6, 2017

Hinokio Report

In the film Hinokio I noticed one big element of culture which was the family orientation. Something that I have noticed is that along with many other countries in Japan they love being with their families. Although in the film Satoru wanted to be alone after the death of his mother his father would still try to get him to get more involved with his son so he wouldn't be feeling so alone.

From my own experience I know how it feels like to lose someone that is close to you although it is not a family member like in the film, I was still super close to her and I could understand him because I too did not want anyone to come around me when the person dear to me had passed away. It takes time to come around and accepting the fact that someone that we hold close to our hearts passes away.

I would give this film a 5 rating because I really like the message that it gives people which is that you shouldn't be afraid to open up to someone because you never know they might be going through the same thing as you are. Once you find someone that is going through the same thing as you it makes it easier to open up so both people going through something can get through it together and both try to get the help that they need. I also liked when Jun and Hinokio were getting close after Jun would bully him for being how we was which was the robot that would go to school for Satoru since he was still unsure about going out in public after the accident that he had and him having to cope with the loss of his mother which I can only imagine is not something easy to do,